The phenomenon had come so suc-denly and mysteriously that their eyes bulged with awe and terror, and they hopped about with trembling legs on their serpentine perch. They saw at once that they had struck a sort of a solid stratum of well snakes, deep, convoluted, and inbraided, a great round ball, as big as a school globe, of hiber-nating reptiles. Worse still, the sphere of slim snake strands, which had been wound into a hard mass, like a ball of wrapping twine in criss-cross fashion during the winter, had instantly burst into multitudinous and nimble consciousness and activity under the tread of the farmers' cowhide boots; then it began to unravel itself, and scores of serpent tails and red forked jaws detached themselves from the mass and shot upward, twining themselves about the men's legs and slapping them viciously. In a moment the whole ball was dissolved into its component parts, which first straightened themselves, forming a palpitating and heaving bat-ter of serpents two feet thick or more, and then the wrathful reptiles, hissing and coiling themselves into swift loops, turned upon the fearful intruders in their den. Those scared persons, now fairly wallowing in snakes, had been stepping lively in order to maintain their unstable footing, and the instant the ser-pents attacked them they were seized with a panic of fright and loathing and made a break to get out of the well; but their feet slipped on the undulat-ing well bottom, and losing their hold on their ladder, which had been set up against the side of the shaft, and which essayed to climb at the same time they fell back into the pit and resumed

Montville, in the country, six miles south of that city, went to the extreme end of Henry's house lot early yesterday morning to clean an old well there, and after ten minutes' work in the well trapped the most extraordinary subterranean snake reservoir noted in the annals of castern Connecticut. The well was a deep, dry one, and for years Dol-beare and his family and other people had flung all sorts of rubbish into it. There were stones and rails, and sticks, old boots, hoopskirts, and tin pans in it, but nobody suspected that away down in the bowels of it was a seething colony of serpents. With their coats off, crowbar in hand, the two men steppieces of debris and flipped them out on and billowing beneath their feet.

For eight minutes the old well seemed to be full of flying snarkes, arms and legs; and gesticulating pinch bars, and the whole underground business ring or swishing uproar, and an ac-companiment of intermittent but reg-

The well was now knee keep in dead snakes. Not a serpent got away. Then the farmers, who were tired out with Dolbeare's home they procured a couple of stable forks and a basket, then returned to the well, and drew all the dead serpents out of it. There were just 144 of them, and the men placed mouth of the pit. All of them were blacks averaged five feet in length. Some of the largest ones were seven feet long and as thick as a man's forearm. It was the farmers in Montville came and saw them. Some farmers drove eight miles
